If there is so much as one drop of nobility in the suditor's heart, this drams, enacted by Booth, will find it out, and send it coursing through the veins in throbs of healthful music re sponsive to its own. Booth is no "counter-feit presentment" of the princely Dane; in the blended gentleness and grandeur of "Hamlet's" nature he simply finds his own. And such is the mute eloquence of his soul, that a touching expression of his features alone, or some ineffably graceful pose, unaid-ed by voiced vibrations to give utterance to the emotion or passion it reflects, has the power, at will, to bring tears from hearts of stone. Is not Hamlet the greatest of human compositions? Its poetry, its philosophy, its sublime moral and religious teachings, place it next to divine inspiration; and as a prophet of old moved by the Spirit to revelations of the Infinite mind, would scarcely recognize his own forecasting visions in their wonder ful denouement, so on Shakspeare's soul no less would "amazement sit" could be behold the unfolding, under the genius of Booth, of this masterwork of his own. Well may "Ophelia" bewail the wreck which brought such wee and broke two loving hearts. Impelled to deeds from which his pure and noble spirit shrinks aghast; the angel of good wrestling in his soul in unequal combat with the demons of doubt and darkness; the sensibility which weeps o'er wounds he has not the choice to withhold ("the must to.
